

Dialogue in Conflict Training

Frequently asked questions

What is the difference between the two trainings?

Dialogue in Conflict is an introductory training in dialogue and conflict analysis suitable for almost all, whereas Dialogue Facilitation is an advanced training for those who want to learn more about, and practice, the role of the dialogue facilitator. The former training is a requirement to enter the latter.

What does the training fee include?

The training fee includes accommodation and three meals for the whole training period, including the Sunday before it starts. Participants are responsible for covering all expenses of travel, insurance, and visa issuance.

Are there any requirements to enter this training?

Participants of this training are selected in an application process based on motivation, background, and availability. However, since this training is introductory, there are no formal requirements to join the training.

Does the training start Monday or Sunday?

The training starts on Monday morning, but we recommend everyone to arrive the prior Sunday evening.

Does the NCPD offer scholarships for trainings?

Normally, the NCPD is not able to offer scholarships to participants outside our cooperation partners and existing network.

Does this training provide any certification?

This training does not consist of any standardized exam. Participants are thus not eligible for certification. They will, however, receive a training certificate upon completion issued by the NCPD with information about training content etc.

How often is this training held?

This training is an annual training held once every year in Lillehammer. The NCPD does offer tailored trainings to groups and organizations throughout the year.
